EXCERPT

Coming here tonight had been a bad idea. She should have held out for a civilized meeting in his office. Instead, she was filled with a recklessness inspired by the dance music's heavy beat and her own dangerous desire.

She had to go.

As a child Savannah had coped with her father's temper and her grandmother's frequent illnesses by hiding somewhere she felt safe. By the time she'd become a teenager, the habit of fleeing difficult situations was fully ingrained in her psyche. Retreat and regroup. Now that she was a mother, she'd grown better at standing her ground, but when overly stressed she fell back on what was familiar. Which explained why she turned away from Trent and headed for the exit.

The club seemed busier than it had five minutes earlier. Savannah wormed through the press of undulating bodies, familiar tightness building in her chest. The ever-changing lights and the hammering beat of the music combined to batter her senses. Her legs shook as she wound her way past the dance floor, and she wrenched her ankle during an awkward sidestep. Her head began to spin. Pressure built until she wanted to scream. She had to get out of the club. But which direction was the exit?

"There you are." The man she'd escaped earlier sneaked his arm around her waist and breathed alcohol at her. Her brief encounter with Trent had stripped away her Courtney armor. Locked in her panic attack, she was vulnerable to the man's boldness. "Thought you could get away from me, didn't you?" His lips met her cheek in an untidy kiss.

"Let me go," she said, but her voice lacked energy and the man was too drunk to hear her even if she'd shouted.

"Let's dance."

"No." She tried to squirm away but found nowhere to escape as the crowd pressed in on them.

All at once a large hand landed on the man's shoulder and tightened. With a yelp the guy set her free.

"Hey, man. What are you doing?"

The drunk might have been a wolf, but Trent was a ferocious lion. "Leave this club before I have you thrown out."

If she hadn't been so rattled, Savannah might have enjoyed the way her assailant scrambled away from Trent.

Despite the heat being generated by a thousand dancers, Savannah's skin prickled with goose bumps. The urge to turn tail and run seized her, but before the impulse worked its way into her muscles, Trent slipped his arm around her waist.

Through modeling Savannah had gained an understanding of her physical appeal. Training to become Courtney Day had shown her how to act more confident. By the time Trent had come to New York to visit his sister, Melody, at Juilliard, Savannah was no longer an insecure girl, but a confident, sensual woman he desired. And more importantly, one he could have.

Falling back into old patterns with Trent was easy and comfortable, and she didn't resist as he drew her away from the crowd. He led her to a nondescript door, used a key card to activate the electronic lock and maneuver her through.

As the door clicked shut behind them, leaving them alone in a brightly lit hallway, Trent brushed her ear with his lips. "I see you still need someone to watch over you."
